Introduction

- Conclusion

Background on Enggano

- Enggano is spoken by approx. 1,500 speakers on Enggano Island, Sumatra, Indonesia
- Indonesia is hugely linguistically diverse – there are over 700 languages (Austronesian & Papuan)
- Most people now agree that Enggano is Austronesian (Nothofer 1992, Edwards 2015, Smith 2020) but sub-grouping remains debated.

Background on Enggano

- Today there are 6 main villages on Enggano
- The highest concentration of Enggano speakers is in central villages (e.g. Meok, Apoho, Malakoni)
- There has been increased migration in recent years, settling predominantly in Northern and Southern villages (e.g. Banjarsari, Kaana & Kaayapo).

Background on Enggano

- The language can be considered endangered or level 3 (“Definitely Endangered”) on UNESCO’s scale
- There are significant differences in reported fluency between older speakers and younger speakers (break in intergenerational transmission)
- Younger speakers increasingly shift to Indonesian and tend to learn Enggano from their grandparents rather than their parents.
- Enggano is also restricted to informal domains (e.g. home), whilst Indonesian is used in formal contexts (e.g. in school).

The Enggano Project

- Our project (2018-now) is a collaboration between researchers in the UK, Germany, Australia and Indonesia and the Enggano community.
- The aims are:
 - To produce a documentary corpus
 - To write a grammar of Enggano
 - To create teaching materials
 - To establish Enggano's position within the Austronesian family.

The Enggano Project

- We have now collected over 200 audio/video recordings
- These include wordlists, structural elicitation, stories, songs, descriptions of cultural practices & texts for the teaching materials

The Enggano Project

- We use software tools like ELAN to annotate the recordings with transcription and translation into Indonesian and English
- We are working with the Enggano community to develop an orthography
- Some challenges include the nasal vowel phonemes (ẽ) and the presence of two centralised vowels (è and ù)

The Enggano Project

- We also use FLEX to store a lexicon provide an interlinear gloss for texts
- We store information from Kahler's corpus to analyse syntactic changes.
- The outputs are available on our project website (<https://enggano.ling-phil.ox.ac.uk/>) and will be archived for long term preservation

Experiences During the Pandemic

- Before the pandemic, the team had already begun to collect a corpus
- Since the pandemic, we have been having regular meetings via Zoom.

- During the meetings we work with the recordings.
- We try to refine our orthographic practices and understand more about the structure of Enggano.

Experiences During the Pandemic

- During these meetings we also provide training and guidance for our main language consultant, Engga Zakaria, who has played a central role in developing the orthography, teaching materials and discussing analyses for the grammar.
- He is part of the local research team that travels to Enggano to gather feedback

Experiences During the Pandemic

- Overall, the COVID pandemic has had disadvantages but also advantages
- It forced much of the linguistic analysis to take place online with the potential disadvantage that the linguists do not observe the language in its natural environment
- However, it has allowed for regular meetings that connect people in different time zones/locations
- Most importantly, we have had no choice but to invest time in capacity building/training of our local team – leading to a more collaborative approach and greater community engagement.

Conclusion

- Enggano is an endangered Austronesian language spoken in Indonesia.
- It was previously documented by Hans Kähler in 1930s
- However, today the language is spoken in a very different sociolinguistic context and has undergone many linguistic changes
- Consequently, we have begun a project to document and describe contemporary Enggano in the hope of creating a lasting record
- The project was conceived before the pandemic but has operated during the pandemic and undergone several changes in project design as a result
- Overall, we feel these changes are positive since they have promoted direct community engagement and empowerment.
